Col. Dent said that when he went upon Grant's staff he said to Grant: "Now, I am your brother-in-law. But I want no favor shown to me on that account. Any duty, however dangerous, that you would give to one of your staff officers you must give to me. More than that, I intend to look after you personally, and if you happen to be hurt I shall try and do better by you than you did by me in Mexico:" Grant laughed. He said: "Well, I guess we won't talk about that." The way Grant looked after Dent in Mexico was this: Dent was badly wounded in one of the engagements of that war and was left by the roadside. Lieut. Grant came along with his men, hurrying to get into the fight. He stopped when be saw Dent and in order to do something to make him comfortable he lifted him out of the road and had him put upon a broad, flat-topped stone wall next to the roadside. He thought that he would be more comfortable there and more conspicuous when the surgeons made their rounds to look after the wounded. But when Grant moved on, Dent slipped and rolled off the wall, falling on the other side. He broke one or two bones and was much worse injured by his fall than he was by his wound. He came very near dving before he was found, but Grant finally dug him out, and after a long service in the hospital Dent recovered.—[T. C. Crawford, in New York World.
